ORDER

On consideration of the in-court arguments this evening and on review of the written arguments regarding the jury question, R. 813, 814, the Court remains convinced that the jury is most likely asking whether the Defendant must know that his alleged conduct was in violation of federal law or, indeed, even in violation of bank compliance policies or CME Rule 432.

The phrase that the jury excerpted from the definition of “knowingly”—“is aware of the nature of his conduct” (emphasis added)—is capable of broad interpretations that require the government to prove more than the what the mental state of “knowingly” actually requires. Specifically, the “nature” of conduct could be interpreted to mean whether the Defendant knew that the conduct was unlawful (that is, “willful” in the spectrum of traditional criminal mental states) or even whether the conduct violated a compliance policy or CME Rule 432. There was extensive examination on whether the Defendant’s conduct violated a policy or Rule 432, and as the Court noted earlier, it is not a far step at all to then ask whether the Defendant must know that the alleged conduct violated federal law. The answer is clearly no: willfulness is not required for a wire-fraud conviction. Indeed, the Seventh Circuit has affirmed a definition of “knowingly” that included the explanation: “To act knowingly does not mean that a defendant had to realize he was violating the law.” See United States v. Brown, 739 F.2d 1136, 1144 & n.5 (7th Cir. 1984).

Indeed, as it stands, the jury only has an instruction explaining that violation of a compliance policy or Rule 432 does not necessarily mean that federal law was violated. The jury does not have the converse—and accurate—statement that a violation of federal law does not necessarily require the jury to find that the Defendant knew that he was violating a compliance policy or Rule 432 (or, for that matter, that the conduct actually violated a policy or the Rule). Although there is no need to go that far in answering the jury's question, it is appropriate to dispel the likely source of conclusion on whether the defendant needed to know that he was violating federal law. The attached response adopts the edits proposed by the defense's backup argument in R. 813 at 4–5.

The Defendant's proposed alternative interpretations of the gist of the jury's question are not realistic. To the defense's thinking, the jury is asking "whether the government is required to prove that Mr. Jordan knew that his conduct involved a scheme to make statements that were false and fraudulent (i.e., the first element of wire fraud affecting a financial institution), or that he had the intent to deceive or cheat in order to obtain money or property from the alleged victim (i.e., the second element)." R. 813 at 3. But the first alternative is explicitly addressed in the instructions (the Defendant must "knowingly devise[] or participate[] in a scheme to defraud," R. 801 at 18) and the second alternative is not sensible because if a person acted with the intent to deceive or cheat, then of course that person knew that he had the intent to deceive or cheat.

In light of the probable import of the question, the Court will give the attached response. There is no need for further in-court argument on December 9, 2022.

Response to Jury Note of December 8, 2022

Dear Jury:

In response to your question, I will clarify that the definition of “knowingly” on page 19 of the jury instructions does not mean that the defendant must be aware of whether his alleged conduct violated federal law. Having said that, I remind you that the government must prove beyond a reasonable doubt all of the elements of wire fraud affecting a financial institution, including (1) that the defendant knowingly devised or participated in a scheme to defraud, which is defined on pages 20–21 of the instructions; and (2) that he acted with the intent to defraud, which is defined on page 22 of the instructions and requires that he act “knowingly with the intent to deceive or cheat the alleged victim in order to obtain money or property from the alleged victim or to cause the potential loss of money or property to the alleged victim.” I also remind you that you should consider the jury instructions as a whole.
